A Brief History of Country Music Hair

The history of country music hair can be traced back to the early days of the genre. In the 1920s and 1930s, country music singers often styled their hair in a simple, utilitarian fashion. Men typically wore their hair short and slicked back, while women often wore their hair in a bun or braids.

In the 1940s and 1950s, country music hair began to take on a more glamorous look. Women began wearing their hair in elaborate updos, and men began to grow their hair longer. This was the era of the "countryopolitan" sound, and country music hair reflected the genre's newfound sophistication.

In the 1960s and 1970s, country music hair became even more diverse. Singers began to experiment with different styles, from long, flowing locks to short, sassy bobs. This was the era of outlaw country, and country music hair reflected the genre's rebellious spirit.

In the 1980s and 1990s, country music hair became more mainstream. Country music stars began to appear on television and in movies, and their hairstyles became more accessible to the general public. This was the era of the "new country" sound, and country music hair reflected the genre's newfound popularity.

Today, country music hair is as diverse as ever. Singers continue to experiment with different styles, and there is no one definitive "country music" hairstyle. However, one thing is for sure: country music hair is always full of personality.
