From the Dawn of Modern Sprinting to the Present Day

The men's 100-meter dash is the most iconic event in track and field. It is a race against time, a test of speed, power, and determination. For over a century, the world's fastest men have competed for the title of Olympic champion and world record holder. Their stories are filled with triumph, heartbreak, and the relentless pursuit of victory.

In The Story Of The Men 100 Metre Champions, acclaimed sportswriter David Goldblatt chronicles the history of this legendary event. From the early days of modern sprinting to the present day, Goldblatt tells the stories of the men who have pushed the limits of human speed.

The Pioneers: From Owens to Lewis

The early chapters of The Story Of The Men 100 Metre Champions focus on the pioneers of sprinting. Men like Jesse Owens, who won four gold medals at the 1936 Olympics, and Carl Lewis, who won nine gold medals in four Olympic Games. These men were not only great athletes, but also icons of their time. They inspired generations of runners and helped to break down racial barriers in sports.

The Modern Era: From Johnson to Bolt

In the modern era, the men's 100-meter dash has been dominated by a few truly exceptional athletes. Men like Michael Johnson, who set the world record in 1996 and won two Olympic gold medals. And Usain Bolt, who is widely considered the greatest sprinter of all time. Bolt won three Olympic gold medals in the 100-meter dash and set the world record in 2009 with a time of 9.58 seconds.
